Two management experts give their perspectives on what makes workers more productive.

The Social Factor in Worker Productivity
By Robert Kohl, HR Director Seabridge Foods

1 All businesses want employees to put
2 forth their best effort. Does providing
3 incentives at the workplace such as free
4 food or a flexible schedule produce a more
5 motivated workforce?
6 Recent research points to something
7 better than these kinds of perks at
8 stimulating worker productivity. Study
9 results found that teams of employees
10 who were the most productive were those 11 who felt a sense of what some call “social
12 security” at work. These successful teams
13 work for companies that have created an
14 environment where it is safe to put forth
15 their ideas and feelings. Sharing these
16 ideas can lead to better problem solving
17 and future growth of the team and
18 company.
19 Moreover, a safe environment for
20 sharing ideas helps to create positive
21 social bonds between employees and
22 managers. When employees share their
23 thoughts and feelings and in turn feel
24 listened to, they are more motivated to do
25 their work and to do it well.
26 Rather than focusing on indulging
27 employees with extras, leaders would do
28 better to participate in, and encourage the 29 sharing of, feelings and ideas. Greater
30 worker satisfaction and overall workplace
31 productivity comes from creating a safe
32 place to share, not necessarily from
33 additional tangible benefits.

Brain Training for Increased Productivity
By Linda Hernandez, CEO Future, Inc.

Smartphones and the internet have created more distractions for workers as social media and communication with friends and families are at people’s fingertips. As such, workers must learn methods to improve focus. Brain training can help workers sort through stimuli, ignore distractions, and strengthen their ability to focus on a single task. All of this will make workers more productive.
According to research, the ability to select which incoming stimuli to focus on and which to screen out could be a learned trait. For example, studies show that people who play certain fast-paced video games consistently strengthen their attention and focus. Researchers discovered that by playing these video games, players get better at certain tasks that can carry over into work. These tasks include improved attention control and being able to keep track of multiple objects and priorities simultaneously. As a result, workers can be more productive and less distracted by other stimuli. Other studies have shown similar results with meditation.
Helping workers train their brains to better focus is key to workplace success. This ability to concentrate is at the crux of improving worker productivity.

What does Linda Hernandez most likely think?

- A. Workers who play video games are effective at work because they do something they enjoy in their free time.
- B. Playing video games at home creates more learned bad habits than good habits in the workplace.
- C. Workplaces would benefit from using technological tools that resemble video games to train workers.
- D. No amount of brain training can make a worker better at being able to ignore distractions.

The Arts and Academic Achievement
By Alejandro Garcia

As schools are challenged by budget cuts, the number of classes in the visual arts, music, and drama are often reduced. When there is so much pressure to increase test scores in subjects such as English, math and science, schools view the arts as a luxury. Although classes in other subjects are important, the view that art instruction isn’t necessary is misinformed; research shows there is a direct correlation between the arts and academic achievement. An arts curriculum is shown to increase cognitive development. Professor Wilde of Wells University has done extensive research on the impact of arts curriculum on academic achievement. Professor Wilde states, “The arts can be like a window into other subjects that brings greater understanding and depth. A mind that learns to form new ideas is much better prepared to absorb them.”

One obstacle that schools commonly cite as being the reason for reducing the number of art classes is lack of time in the school day. With the increasing demands to boost test scores in other subjects, the number of choices in the arts is often first to go. But time doesn’t need to be an obstacle if art is directly linked to other subjects. In addition to existing classes, when the arts are integrated with other subjects, they can enhance learning. For example, music can be used to teach fractions in a math class, and a theatrical performance can be used to teach important events in history. The gains from involvement in the arts can lead to student success well beyond the benefits of self-expression.

Which statement from the article best shows the author's main point?

- A. An arts curriculum is shown to increase cognitive development.
- B. A mind that learns to form new ideas is much better prepared to absorb them.
- C. With the increasing demands to boost test scores in other subjects, art is left out.
- D. When the arts are integrated with other subjects, they can enhance learning.
